

The inclusion of devices intended to prevent copying of materials from broadcast television is an affront to consumers. Regulation of this type would prohibit lawful uses of such information. This is clearly designed for the benefit of a small number of special interests in the television and motion picture industry. The job of the FCC is not to protect the copyright interests of Television and movie producers. They have legal recourse for copyright violation through a number of other means. To cripple equipment belonging to the public for the interests of a few corporations is un-American, if Congress wants it done, make them do it themselves, don't do their dirty work for them.
